More than one in ten of the best-paid jobs in the City of London cost more than £150,000 and the highest earner earned more than £450,000, according to an investigation of the top 100 earners by the Daily Telegraph and Press Association. The newspaper has analysed the personal data of City workers, including identities, salaries, job titles and abbreviations, to create a comprehensive list of the highest earner in the Square Mile's booming financial sector. While the document, published on the paper's website, cannot reveal exact salaries or the number of people in each job, it will be used to calculate various statistics including the average wage for a City worker and the gender pay gap. The top earner, who earns an average of £286,389, is a man who is also employed in the same

The revelation is likely to cause embarrassment for City firms, who are already facing criticism over the gender pay gap and a backlash over bonuses on top of basic salaries.
