How to stick to a training program Long-term control over how much you eat is as difficult as it sounds. The easiest way to get long-term control over how much you eat is to keep a food journal. Food journaling is simply writing down what you eat and keep track of the weight. The idea is to recognize what your food intake is doing to you, regardless of what you are eating. Once you start food journaling you will find that you will be less likely to "blow up" on your favorite foods and snacks. When you start food journaling be sure you keep track of the following: The length of time you have been journaling (days, weeks, or months). The weight of your food journal. If you are not seeing any changes after a few days, then consider adding more categories of food. How often you record the day's food. This is based on the guidelines in the book you are currently following. When you first start journaling, most people record their food intake every time they eat, then after a couple of weeks, you increase the frequency and once a week, and then finally after several months to a year, you no longer need to record your food intake. Whatever your preference, it's important that you take notes on the following: Any progress you have made. This includes not only calories, but also reducing cravings, increasing fitness, and decreasing the amount of sugar and carbohydrates consumed. Any slips you have had in your food journal. This is important to
