In a general cellular phone system, the locations of individual cells are not well defined and they can overlap with cells in adjacent towers. When the signal strength from a given cell phone receiver is too weak for voice communication with the desired cell phone, or there is the absence of a desired cell phone signal, the user can still initiate a voice communication via an adjacent cell phone receiver (e.g., another cell phone receiver that is attached to the same mobile handset) that is closer to a more promising cell phone signal. A more promising cell phone signal means that the signal is stronger and/or closer to the cell phone receiver. In such cases, the user will initiate a voice communication via a cell phone receiver that is closer to a more promising cell phone signal in order to avoid inconveniencing another person that is speaking on the cell phone of a friend or family member. However, if the network fails to notice that the user has moved into a more promising cell phone signal region and continues to signal via a cell phone receiver that is weaker and/or farther away from the more promising cell phone signal region, the user
