Noisy fans is something I have noticed before, but in my case it happens with every aircraft I fly. In this case, the only noise is the four engines, which sound a bit different then the Q400. The left-hand engine seems a bit faster, but thats not very apparent in the cabin. The stewardess comes up to the window several times an hour and tells us that the coffee is ready. I dont know if I prefer this or not. Regarding the ground roll, it seems to be quite good. I have heard of aircraft that dont do this at all, so it's a bit of a new thing for me. I will have to check this out. The cabin itself is silent. No stewardesses coming up to the cockpit or anything else. And the engines are much quieter than in p3d v4. I think it's pretty reasonable that they introduce a new product and try to get a boost at first, but it takes a while before you notice these small details. But this is understandable with PMDG, it's not something they do every day. Once you finally start flying the Cloudmaster, its new user interface is well designed, easy to use and nearly effortless. Only a little bit of practice is needed to operate the VC. If you forget something, the aircraft still flies as intended. Another plus is that some of the more complex switches (like seatbelt switches) have more than one purpose. Turns out that running to US Airways (or Panamanian) from BWI on a Saturday evening, you might just want to turn off the engine management, so you can get a few drinks in without running away with the aircraft. Of course, turning off the engine management also means you stop flying the VC, as you no longer can fly the aircraft after taking off. A small detail that does not bother many, but might just make you pause for a moment and consider whether to disconnect the VC at that moment. With a nice set of sound effects and a fully satisfying flight experience, you would not want to hesitate about the DC-6s purchase. All in all a great product, PMDG should rethink their pricing policies on their add-ons. As they do it almost enough to be hard to realize this product, actually, is overpriced.
