EconomicsBotinUSA Account Virus Free Download.zip The UK government has been given permission to censor the internet! In the light of recent terrorist attacks, the Department for Digital, Culture, Media, and Sport (DCMS) has agreed to to a request by the Home Office to tighten up the law on online content. And the Government could impose a mandatory internet filter, check which websites you have visited, and even see your private emails! WiFi and internet service providers would have to comply with this new law, and could be fined if they do not. This is shocking news, and Netizens should be concerned about the kind of thing that the Government might be able to do if they want to. the Net maybe hacked This column originally appeared in The Guardian. It was written by David Held. When looking at solutions to political problems, it is often useful to consider the potential impact of different remedies, from the design of a new technological infrastructure to civil disobedience. The Internet is the best example of a complex infrastructure—designed and built by private firms as well as a government, but widely held to be the property of the public—that limits freedom, often through the deployment of new technologies. The Internet itself is a communications network, made up of computer systems and other hardware that is interconnected by means of commercial or public internet Protocol (IP) addresses. Sites are also accessed using domain names, which are based on human readable alpha-numeric sequences, which, to make them unique, are associated with registered trademarks. The process of registering a site name on a Net domain is known as registering a domain name. It is a prerequisite for using the Internet to establish an online presence, typically as an individual or a company, and to gain access to web pages or a web site using the Internet. Countries may choose to censor the internet either because of security threats or because of political freedom issues. Internet censorship is defined by the United Nations as when \"a country or an Internet service provider imposes content restrictions or blocks on information originating from or accessible through the country.\" It is most commonly targeted towards sites that deal with pornography, drug use, and other issues. The United Kingdom has become the latest country to plan to censor the Internet, for the purpose of combating the growth of online pornography. This week, the government published a paper in which they propose that all internet service providers must act against child abuse by developing a system that would allow the UK government to censor the Internet. They also stated that they would move towards a mandatory Internet filtering system. This is a huge leap forward for the United Kingdom, as even their Prime Minister, David Cameron has been highly against such a proposal. The government have made this decision at a time when the UK is dealing with a huge terrorist threat, with the London Bridge attacks only days ago. If they are to deliver on this new proposal, then it will be a major breach of the individual's right to privacy. This is a proposal that would also be unfair in its impact. This will be a breach of the legal rights of the UK's citizens. The Internet was created by the US Department of Defense in the late 1980s as a means of ensuring that military communications were secure.
