More info: were you my first? A Canadian woman will turn the tables on her biological parents this week, becoming the first in the world to have a baby conceived via a sperm donor. And the parents are truly thrilled. The unnamed woman was conceived after she and her boyfriend split, but when she became pregnant, he refused to take a paternity test. "My ex doesn't want to take responsibility and I don't want him to take responsibility," she told CBC. "But I want him to be a father." The couple didn't have sperm from a specific donor, but agreed on their terms. They drew sperm from five men. The donors told them they wanted their identities kept confidential. Just one man, however, agreed to provide the couple with sperm. The unnamed donor's sperm is the only one that was used to create the baby. All five of the donor's sperm are frozen and will remain frozen for the donor's children, if any. The donor will also be a part of the couple's life and their baby's life. They will not have to be separated, the anonymous man will not have to travel and meet the child, and the donor will have a say in the child's life. "It will be a very traditional family structure, with him raising the child. I will be there and I will be a part of the child's life, if he wants me there," he said. The woman's mother and father won't have contact with the baby, she said. They are upset, angry and hurt that the daughter gave their sperm to a sperm bank. "The first thing that came to mind when I was pregnant was, I'm in for it," the woman said. The woman, who is now 21 months pregnant, will give birth in the fall. "It's nice to know that people think it's OK to do it this way," she said. The sperm donor says he is excited to be a part of his first child's life,
