Look, I'm a big fan of the program. Photoshop is great. It's easy to learn, and even easier to use for most people. And, it's inexpensive. But, for some of you, it may be a bit frustrating to try to create something while realizing that it just won't work. When you import your image, there are sometimes problems if you didn't bother to select the absolute best settings in the Common Gamma or Clarity slider boxes. And, yes, you need to be fully aware of the Layers panel, sorting out what is transparent and what is not. It can take hours to find and fix an issue if you do not see what is going on under the hood. The really neat thing about all this is that it happens to us. However, the good thing about that kind of frustration is that it keeps us from getting lazy. We simply take another look at the settings, we step back and re-think them, we modify them, we take another look, then we see if we have any information to actually fix what really needs fixing. And then we do it again. If we keep at it, we get it, and then we have that aside to keep all our photos in perfect condition. It can be a big headache to get this kind of thing right, but if we can just do it once, then it's a small price to pay. A great thing about the image editing software is that you can always learn more about it. There's not a lot of options out there that give you more information than they do. Truly, it's a wonderful tool, and one that I use on a daily basis on my photos. I'd really like to see a version of Adobe Photoshop Update and Lightroom Update a bit more streamlined. They kind of feel a bit cumbersome. I'm sure they can be tweaked a bit, but I think that there is a better way. It probably involves someone other than me seeing this as a problem and fixing it. But, it's a great tool, and definitely the best image editing tool in the world.
